Ahimsā, Anekānta and Jainism

edited by Tara Sethia

AHIMSĀ, ANEKĀNTA AND JAINISM

Edited by TARA SETHIA

MOTILAL BANARSIDASS PUBLISHERS PRIVATE LIMITED • DELHI

First Edition: Delhi, 2004

© MOTILAL BANARSIDASS PUBLISHERS PVT. LTD. All Rights Reserved

ISBN: 81-208-2031-2 (Cloth) ISBN: 81-208-2036-3 (Paper)

MOTILAL BANARSIDASS

41 U.A. Bungalow Road, Jawahar Nagar, Delhi 110 007 8 Mahalaxmi Chamber, 22 Bhulabhai Desai Road, Mumbai 400 026 120 Royapettah High Road, Mylapore, Chennai 600 004 236, 9th Main III Block, Jayanagar, Bangalore 560 011 Sanas Plaza, 1302 Baji Rao Road, Pune 411 002 8 Camac Street, Kolkata 700 017 Ashok Rajpath, Patna 800 004 Chowk, Varanasi 221 001

Printed in India
BY JAINENDRA PRAKASH JAIN AT SHRI JAINENDRA PRESS,
A-45 NARAINA, PHASE-I, NEW DELHI 110 028 AND PUBLISHED BY NARENDRA PRAKASH JAIN FOR MOTILAL BANARSIDASS PUBLISHERS PRIVATE LIMITED, BUNGALOW ROAD, DELHI 110 007

Anekānta, Ahiṃsā and the Question of Pluralism

ANNE VALLELY

Jainism embraces the philosophy of anekānta as staunchly as it espouses the righteousness of ahiṃsā. Anekānta and ahiṃsā are customarily discussed in terms of how each presupposes the other. The acceptance of the partiality of knowledge is an expression of nonviolence; and a commitment to nonviolence necessitates a pluralistic outlook. The two are seen essentially as different aspects of the same ethical orientation. But can we treat ahiṃsā as a normative ethical ideal, and accept as morally just the view (and practice) of others who repudiate it? It has been argued that a truly pluralist approach is a logical impossibility—that some criteria of truth are essential to all worldviews. Pluralism, therefore, becomes either a form

Jainism shares with India's other religious traditions a commitment to pluralism Harold Coward writes, "India is probably the world's oldest and most interesting 'living laboratory' of religious pluralism." See H.G. Coward (ed.), Modern Indian Responses to Religious Pluralism (Albany: Sate University of New York Press, 1987), p. xi.

anekanta is a way out of this epistemological quagmire, and exclusivism.2 In this paper, I suggest the possibility that into extreme moral relativism or exclusivity that a genuine pluralist view is possible without lapsing moral relativism, or another form of religious

An Experiment with Jain Pluralism

should not know what the right hand has given." humility in the context of charity. It read: "The left hand attributed to Jesus, emphasising the importance of guest house where I stayed was a placard with a saying displayed throughout the JVBI. For instance, next to the of wisdom from other, non-Jain traditions are prominently the recognition given to other paths: placards with words unambiguous ethical stance, I was immediately struck by nonviolence as the highest ideal. And yet, despite this alcohol are strictly forbidden. These are not timid mising edicts rooted in a bold moral charter that upholds recommendations; they are unapologetic and uncomprofor ahimsa. Although these rules include matters of decorum (e.g., rules of conduct that must be observed while in the JVBL proper attire, no smoking), they are essentially guidelines Jains in India, there was a large signpost indicating the Bharati Institute (JVBI), the spiritual base of the Terapanthi As I entered the western gates of the Jain Vishva For instance, the consumption of meat and and also accept as true other-ways-of-being, especially that may be diametrically opposed? Can one be a strong defender of one's own beliefs Critics of > all essentially exclusivists; we cannot help but judge others critics assert, whether or not we want to accept it, we are which rapidly leads to an epistemological dead end. Thus, would require one to be a relativist about one's relativism, by some criteria arising from our own worldview.3 that to be consistently relativistic about knowledge claims pluralism argue that such a thing is a logical impossibility;

Religions," Religious Studies, 32 (June 1996): 223-232, pp. 225-26. 2 Gavin D' Costa, "The Impossibility of a Pluralist View of

truth (as Mahāvīra did with respect to nonviolence) can that the holding of even an uncompromising position on does not require it. Anekānta does not predicate its an impossibility for ordinary humans, but the doctrine an alternative. It grants that epistemological neutrality is moral diversity coexist with a celebration of conceptual, philosophical and pluralism on epistemological neutrality. Instead, it asserts The Jain doctrine of anekanta may, however, offer a year's sojourn, Gaṇādhipati Gurudeva Tulsi (the ninth acarya of the Terapanthi order) assigned me the job of important that they take this opportunity to learn. And so other branches of Indian philosophy at the JVBI, but that training). He explained that the samanis pursue studies in "Teacher of Christianity" for the samanis (nuns-insamanis and I began to meet thrice a week for our lesson. began our experiment with anekantavada. A small group of they know little of non-Indian faiths. He considered it Soon after I arrived at the JVBI, for what would be

The Raising of Lazarus: The Fall of Anekanta?

Oxford University Press, 1988). Religions," ³ See G. D'Costa, The Impossibility of a Pluralist View of op. cit.; and Nicholas Rescher, Rationality (London:

and curious about events with which they had little putting into practice the principles and pleasures of familiarity. I enjoyed our inter-religious dialogues and history. The samants were excellent students, eager to learn things I knew best, focusing on Jewish and Christian The first few weeks went smoothly. I talked about those hurdles to a pluralistic approach. came up against, what seemed at the time, intransigent the life and teachings of Jesus. It was here that I eventually religious learning, they wanted to hear moral stories about historical detail. Familiar with the narrative form of But soon the samanis grew weary of the focus on because of his radically egalitarian beliefs. social conventions, he likewise encountered resistance equal in the eyes of God. The samants liked the story, and leader. They explained that when he, too, challenged many recounted parallel incidents of courage in the life of their humility; as a message about seeing all human beings as interpreted this narrative as a lesson in human frailty and "only he who has not sinned should cast the first stone." I community for condemning a prostitute, declaring that outcasts. I recounted the time when he chided his about how Jesus helped the poor, the destitute, sketchy. However, I selected those stories that I thought best resonated with the Jain vision of things: I told them My repertoire of the New Testament stories was assuredly. While it was not quite the way a priest would formulated their own. "Tapas" (austerities), they said the desert. This was a fortuitous choice. Even before I suggest an interpretation, the I continued with the story of Jesus' forty-day fast in samanīs considered an ascetic in that he had few possessions and explain it were meaningful to them. 'students' were learning stories of another tradition that was celibate. I felt a sense of accomplishment, My to his congregation, Jesus could also be stories of turning water into wine, and of raising a man But other than the most obvious point of telling them that puzzled them: Of what religious significance were the know their religious significance. In particular, two stories had heard bits and pieces of other stories and wanted to the stories have spiritual significance? Jesus was special, that he was able to perform miracles, did from the dead? I considered these to be good questions My success, however, was short-lived. The samants to come out. To everyone's astonishment, he emerged the cave where Lazarus was buried, and called upon him days. Everyone in the village was distraught. Jesus went to he returned to the village, Lazarus had been dead for four for Jesus to return, but he received it too late. By the time when Jesus was away from his village. A message was sent "Lazarus was a beloved friend of Jesus who fell ill once Jesus had raised him from the dead." "Well, let's start with the story of Lazarus," I said life?" a samanı asked. "But why? Why did Jesus bring him back to suffering." I answered "Jesus wanted to help the family that was this family," the samant duly persisted "But everyone loses someone to death; why help

I had no profound answer for the samants; but maintained my teacherly stance: "I believe he tried to help whoever was in need. This was a very tragic situation, and because he was able to help, he did."

"But we all must die. This man, Lazarus, too must die, yes? So why help in a physical way? Why not help his soul? Or help his family to understand death?"

I had no answer. This had always struck me as an odd miracle, and I could not expound on its theological import.

"And the wine story?" another samant asked, hoping I might better explain this one.

"Just as in the story of Lazarus, the most significant thing about the story is that it reveals Jesus to be unlike other men," I waffled, "He was able to perform miracles. The fact that he could do these miraculous things is evidence, for Christians, of his divine status..."

"But if he was god, why would he do that miracle? Why not something more important?" one of the samans asked.

"And why just for one wedding party?" asked another.

I knew immediately that I was on less than solid ground when I tried to explain that alcohol was not prohibited, irreligious or himsa from within the Judaeo-Christian tradition. In fact, wine plays a significant role on special occasions in both Jewish and Christian celebrations. Then, when I added my own Epicurean interpretation of the significance of a blissful life, I had all but lost my audience. From a Jain point of view, the miraculously supplying of intoxicating beverages for a wedding party hardly seemed a pious narrative worthy of passing down from one generation to another for nearly two thousand years. In fact, the more we talked about it, the more ridiculous it appeared, and eventually we succumbed to a fit of laughter.

Rather than being an instrument for the glorification of anekantavada, I felt I was helping to undermine it. Rather than convincing the samanīs that Christianity had a corner on truth (just like Jainism), I felt I was setting it up as an example of mithyādarśana, a deluded view of reality. I sat back, half bemused, and half frustrated with my inability to evoke some appreciation of the teachings of Christianity. It was not as though I expected the samanīs to be rapturous over the Biblical stories, but I knew I was not doing the tradition justice. These stories meant so much to so many people; why was I so poor an emissary? I regrouped my thoughts and took a third stab at it.

"If you think about it," I began, "these are really stories about compassion and universal friendliness (karuṇā and maitrī). This is the Golden Rule – to treat others as you would have them treat you." I continued, "Imagine the power of his actions – that a person capable of such greatness would concern himself with our mundane needs proves his boundless compassion."

The samanis considered my words. They were not greatly impressed with the explanation. But it was one that at least made sense to them. A form of compassion and friendship that focused on the material well-being appeared very crude and not very inspiring. They reckoned, however, that perhaps this 'blunt' compassion was what was most suitable for those on the low rungs of the gunasthana (stages of spiritual progress) "Perhaps this was all the people could understand," one samant proposed. Another agreed by adding, "Later the people could be taught that true compassion is concerned with the soul, not the body." I was uneasy with their rendition, but felt that I did not have the tools or ability to convey an alternate, more 'profound' interpretation.

The Limits of Pluralism

Back in my room that evening, with time to reflect, I became doubtful about the promise of pluralism. Had not today's exchange revealed its weakness? Rather than truly engage in a suspension of criticism, and an appreciation of the "other" on its own terms, we had sought to translate Christianity into a Jain idiom.⁴ I had attempted to tailor Christianity to fit what I believed was my audience's worldview, and the samanis accepted as significant only those aspects that did not deviate from their already held beliefs.

But could it be otherwise? Not according to Gavin D'Costa who argued that the idea of pluralism is misconceived and that, in essence, it is nothing more than a form of exclusivism. He wrote:

[T]here is no such thing as pluralism because pluralists are committed to holding some form of truth criteria and by virtue of this, anything that falls foul of such criteria is excluded from counting as truth (in doctrine and in practice). Thus, pluralism operates within the same logical structure of exclusivism and in this respect pluralism can never really affirm the genuine autonomous value of religious pluralism for, like exclusivism, it can only do so by tradition specific criteria for truth.⁵

It is interesting to note that the philosopher Nicholas Rescher and the anthropologist Richard Shweder anticipated many of D'Costa's critiques of pluralism. They argued, from their respective disciplines, that our celebrations of conceptual diversity fall short of true pluralism; that although most of us pay lip service to the idea of pluralism, we refuse to accept its logical outcome. The pluralist platform states the following.⁶

- 1. We the members of our group (religious or otherwise) are rationally justified in our conception of things.
- They, the members of some other group, have a different conception of things.
- 3. They, the members of that other group, are rationally justified in their conception of things.

And yet these points, inevitability, lead to a fourth and final proposition, that most people repudiate:

⁴ There are a number of scholars of religion, such as Cantewell Smith, Mircea Eliade, who prioritise the autonomous, interior, and generally inaccessible personal dimensions of religious experience at the expense of observable, comparative data, and who would, therefore, be suspicious of my hope to "appreciate the Other on its own terms."

Religions," op. cit., p. 226.

⁶ This platform is paraphrased from R. Shweder, Thinking Through Cultures. (Cambridge & London: Harvard University Press,1991). See also Nicholas Rescher, Rationality, op. cit.

4. If others are rationally justified in their conception of things and that their conception is different from ours, then we cannot be rationally justified in our conception of things, and vice versa.

An unwillingness to entertain this fourth proposition, however, -results in the incoherence of the entire platform. As a result of this, critics of pluralism assert that pluralists give an account of the 'other' against a backdrop of their own worldview – every bit as much as do exclusivists. If we accept that, epistemologically, pluralism is a no-man's-land, we are left – it would seem – with few options: either we must 'grow up' as some critics would have, and acknowledge our inherently exclusivist ways-of-knowing (i.e., accept that we cannot avoid imposing our own standards on others) or retreat to a position of philosophical and moral subjectivism, which claims the source of truth to reside within the individual subject alone.

Contemporary society is characterised by these opposing positions--we are simultaneously plagued by intolerance and ethnocentric smugness, and weakened by radical subjectivism and moral relativism. Ironically, the latter (moral relativism) is commonly seen as the progressive response to the former (ethnocentrism). In rejecting the view that all peoples should be judged by a single standard, many leap to the conclusion that standards, as such, do not exist at all. However, locating the criteria for truth within the thinking subject alone denies the social basis of knowledge as much as it denies the possibility of a transcendent reality. The Jain doctrine of anekanta suggests another possibility.

Anekāntavāda: A Way Out?

So basic is anekanta considered to be to a non-violent way-of-knowing, that it is considered an intrinsic element of the ethic of ahiṃsā. Mahāvīra is attributed as saying:

Those who praise their own faiths and ideologies and blame that of their opponents and thus distort the truth will remain confined to the cycle of birth and death.8

Anekāntavāda asserts that no viewpoint is to be taken as the final, definitive viewpoint because reality itself (and not just our human perception of it) is many-sided. Herein lies its strength and its divergence from other pluralist positions, which tend to focus on epistemology alone. Although anekāntavāda does have an epistemological component – especially in its related principle of "syadvada" ("doctrine of maybe"), which states that truth is predicated on one's condition or context, its support of pluralism is bolstered by its metaphysical contention that reality itself is not singular.

⁷ These questions lead us into the well-rehearsed debates over the nature and definition of "religion." Many contemporary critiques of "religion" as a reductionist, scholarly category advocate the sui generis, a temporal essence of religious acts, or the interiorised nature of religious experience. For an excellent review of this debate, see Russell T. McCutcheon, "The Category of "Religion" in Recent Publications: A Critical Survey," Numen (42: 4, 1995): 284-309.

⁸ This quote from Mahavira comes from the Sūtrakṛtānga. 1.1.2.23, as quoted in J.B. Trapnell, "Indian Sources of a Pluralist View of Religions," Journal of Ecumenical Studies (35:2, Spring 1998), p. 219.

Padmanabh Jaini explains, "In its wholeness, any reality is the co-existence of contradictory elements, such as eternity and transience, or unity and multiplicity."9 Different ways-of-being and of knowing are understood as "nayas", that is, as logically distinct viewpoints, each coherent and true to its context, but ultimately partial.

reality emerge. exposure to other ways of being, will a fuller picture of (ideally) mandates an encounter with it. It is only through this. It does not merely give 'permission' to diversity; it diverse signs of our 'divinity.' Anekantavada goes beyond constructed) according to different cultural traditions diverse responses to the Transcendent. The Transcendent various religious phenomena are culturally conditioned expression of pluralism than the one typically encountered be explored in the search for truth. This is a different a monopoly on truth and that, in fact, other nayas should permission to diversity and difference; to see in others Therefore, the aim of pluralism and relativism is to give is singular, but manifests itself (or is differently (and critiqued). The standard pluralist position claims that Jainism, thus, recognises that no one tradition has

All the nayas, therefore, in their exclusively individual standpoints are absolutely faulty. If, however, they consider themselves as supplementary to each other, they are right in their viewpoints...[I]f all the nayas arrange themselves in a proper way and supplement each other, then alone they are worthy of being termed as "the whole truth" or the right view in its entirety.¹⁰ conception is different from ours, we too can be rationally of the pluralist platform, namely that "If others are anekantavada does allow us to affirm the fourth proposition understood to be 'many sided' and thus reveals itself in not mean it can be understood singularly; reality is existent reality. Yet accepting the existence of reality does reality beyond appearances, anekantavada accepts an or nihilistic strains of relativism that assert there is no sided" might allow us to accept the four propositions of a reality is accepted as manifold, this is no longer illogical. rationally justified in their conception of things and that both the 'equivocal pluralists' and the critics of pluralism, manifold ways simultaneously. Therefore, in opposition to justified in our conception of things, and vice versa." If pluralist platform, enumerated above. Unlike eliminative A re-visioning of our view of reality as not "one Anekantavada can, perhaps, help redress the epistemological muddle in which we post-moderns find ourselves. The fact that there is no singular uniform standard of truth does not mean there are no standards or no truths; because there is not a single uniform reality, does not mean that reality does not exist.

⁹ P.S. Jaini, The Jaina Path of Purification (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979), p. 91.

¹⁰Quoted from Siddhasena Divakara's Sanniati Tarka as cited in J.B. Trapnell, "Indian Sources of a Pluralist View of Religions," op. cit., p. 220.

Lazarus Revisited: Conclusion

Putting the doctrine of anekānta into practice is a huge challenge. And in hindsight, I believe that my stumblings in Ladnun were not so much evidence of failure, as they were evidence of this challenge. I had made the pluralists' mistake of believing openness to the other required a break from one's own beliefs – a temporary suspension in epistemological limbo. This view is futile and full of inconsistencies. But Jain pluralism does not require it and therefore the possibility for an honest and creative acceptance of diversity can exist.

The Jain samanīs of Ladnun uncompromisingly maintained ahimsā to be an eternal and unchangeable moral law. Other views or practices that would contradict these beliefs would certainly be challenged, and ultimately rejected. But what is significant, I believe, is that both the retention and rejection of views is tempered by the belief that our perception conveys only a partial reality, that reality itself is manifold, and that to assume that one particular point of view is final is to hold a limited picture of reality.

The doctrine of anekāntavāda or many-sidedness comes close to obligating its adherents to become familiar with other ways-of-knowing. My appointment in Ladnun as "Teacher of Christianity" is a testament to that. And, in so doing, it goes a long way towards accomplishing the goal at the very core of pluralism, that is, recognition of autonomy and legitimacy of the very diversity of human existence.